FINDINGS

The thesis examines the influence of political, ideological, and identity factors on Arab novelists during and after the Arab Spring. By analyzing Arabic novels, the research aims to understand how these narratives represent the events of the uprisings and compare them to scholarly and political perspectives. The study explores the cultural, linguistic, and historical attributes that define Arab identity and investigates the socio-political conditions of the Arab world before and after the uprisings. It also examines the role of Arabic literature in preparing for and shaping the Arab Spring, analyzing the similarities and differences between literary and political interpretations of these events. The research concludes by discussing the enduring impact of the Arab Spring on the region and the ongoing struggle for democracy, human rights, and social changes.

The thesis begins by examining the cultural, linguistic, and historical attributes that define Arab identity, exploring the shared experiences and values that unite Arab people. It then investigates the socio-political conditions of the Arab world before and after the uprisings, examining the factors that contributed to the unrest and the hopes and aspirations that fueled the revolutionary movements. The research also explores the role of Arabic literature in preparing for and shaping the Arab Spring, analyzing how novelists addressed issues of political corruption, social injustice, and cultural oppression.

Furthermore the study compares the literary and political interpretations of the Arab Spring, analyzing the similarities and differences between the perspectives of novelists and scholars. It examines how novelists used their art to challenge authoritarian regimes, inspire social change, and document the experiences of ordinary people caught up in the upheaval. The research concludes by discussing the enduring impact of the Arab Spring on the region and the ongoing struggle for democracy, human rights, and social changes.
