ANATOMY OF A RESEARCH

Anirudh is a research analyst at RAND Europe, specialising in Home Affairs and Social Policy. After obtaining a Masters in Education from TISS Mumbai, they ventured into diverse research environments, further solidifying their belief in the accessibility and universality of research. Throughout their journey, Anirudh has worked as a researcher with NGOs, academic institutions and think tanks, and advocated for taking research out of strictly formal institutions while preserving methodological rigour. This desire led them to pursue Research Design and Methodologies at the University of Oxford. The upcoming talk mirrors their aspiration to make research more inclusive and impactful for all.

This talk will explore the boundaries of research. Drawing from his rich experiences, Anirudh will suggest a challenge to the traditional notion that research is strictly an academic endeavour. Instead, they advocate for a broader view, where research serves as a tool for all, enriching our decisions and actions in diverse roles. With a focus on its universal relevance and real-world applicability, this session aims to argue that the depth of academic research can be, and perhaps must be, sought after along with the insights of practitioners, emphasising that valuable research can occur beyond institutional walls.
